God was with the little colony of heroic spirits who planted this town, and reared this meeting-house. We assemble to remember that Providential guidance, to revive the lustre of a noble history, and thus quicken all deep and noble sentiments. I cannot promise you I shall be brief, for that seems neither just to you nor to the subject. I will not impair the dignity and scope of my theme by headlong brevity. Two centuries we are to traverse, a marvellous record to revive; there is justice to be done, and fit lessons are to be drawn. True, much of the historical material on which I must rely has been printed; but it is not accessible; the young know it not. From such sources I shall draw only those portions which seem necessary to the right proportion of my remarks. We may well linger, and spare not our words, as the two-hundredth anniversary of this ancestral sanctuary passes by. Not for a half century probably will you have another important anniversary; and so many of us will not be here!
