A poor, as gloomy and dark and still As the river of death, lies under the hill: Rocks aro above and rocks below, White with the last of the winters snow: And the trees that rise in the lifeless air Are old and jagged and wholly bare. The hill is barren and bleak and cold: Its last years herbage is dead and sere: Far underneath the frozen mould Oozes the spring to its outlet hero. Laying my cheek to the silent earth, I seem to hear in the depthsbelow, The troublous murmurings of its birth--Tho ebb and pulse of its onward flow. The violet blue, and the daisy dear, Could never bloom in this lonely place; Tet the Spirit of Beauty has lingered here, And kit a token of splendid grace. For, floating upon that icy bed, Kmbosomed among those...
